

New Albany

more than just a pretty fence.

Master plan makes national news

In an increasingly competitive economic development landscape, New Albany's emphasis on protecting business investment for the long term has caught the attention of the nation's leading site selection publication, Site Selection magazine.

"Companies like the idea that they know who their neighbors are today and who they are going to be tomorrow," says Jennifer Chrysler, director of community development.

The article touts New Albany's master planning and its attention to the type of assets that drive business growth, including a fiber optic network that saves the average New Albany business 15 to 20 percent on technology costs.
